Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a camera capable of recording a still picture on a film by an aperture of a shutter and also capable of recording a moving picture on the film by exposure of the shutter. 2. Description of the Prior Art A camera capable of recording a picture still image by an aperture of a shutter as a still picture, and then recording a moving picture by exposure of the shutter to light, has been proposed. A conventional camera of this type is a still camera. A film cartridge having a film is set in the camera and, after a shutter mechanism is set to an operative condition, the photographer can perform an operation for recording a still picture by an aperture of the shutter mechanism and then for recording a moving picture by exposure of the shutter mechanism to light. In this camera, when a shutter release button is depressed, the shutter is automatically released in the first operation, and a film is advanced by a predetermined distance in the second operation. When the film is stopped, light exposure, i.e. photography, begins. In this photography, an aperture of the shutter is automatically controlled so that an aperture diameter after a lapse of a predetermined time from a shutter actuation may be the same as an aperture diameter before the shutter actuation. The shutter is released at the same time a rear-screen shutter curtain travels to close the aperture. After light exposure, the rear-screen shutter curtain moves at a predetermined speed, and an aperture diameter formed by the rear-screen shutter curtain becomes the same as the aperture diameter at the shutter actuation. Therefore, in this camera, a picture image, which is formed by a difference in the aperture diameter between
